Petals and Plants

by Stephanie Webb

654-4320, Home 654-1611, Business

Plants, like humans, are susceptible to destructive environmental forces. When a plant becomes weak, those environmental elements can cause various problems. When you notice anything unusual or see a change in your plant you should take immediate action. Always be careful not to spread a disease or pest from one plant to the rest. Don't keep your sick plants in the same place as your healthy ones. Find a secluded place to keep your sick plant while you treat it.

If you find you cannot cure the plant it is best to throw the plant and dirt away to keep the disease from spreading to other plants. It is also wise to throw the pot away unless you can sanitize it.

The next two weeks this column will publish a list of general plant problems and the solutions - remember if your plant has had this problem for a period of time you may not be able to cure it.

Aphids - symptom - new leaves curled, discolored and smaller than normal. A shiny, sticky substance may coat the leaves. Tiny wingless, green insects cluster on buds, stems and leaves.

Cure - spray with a pesticide containing resmethrin. Make sure your plant is listed on the product label and follow label directions carefully.

Fungus Gnats - symptoms - small dark insects fly around when plants are disturbed. They also crawl on the leaves and dirt. They lay their eggs in the soil.
